One in four people in the U.S. has a criminal record.
This is the other 75%.

Participants in We Are All Criminals tell stories of crimes they got away with. The stories range from humorous to humbling, but all have one thing in common: they are privately held memories without public stigma. Each shows that often times the only thing separating clean from criminal is who gets caught.

PRIVATE MEMORY: I WORK IN CORRECTIONS. I SOLD DRUGS.

In high school I started experimenting with alcohol, marijuana, whatever I could get my hands on. I was still in school when I started living out of my car, sleeping in Walmart parking lots and dodging cops.

I picked up a job at a gas station, but it was really just a cover. What I really did to make money was sell LSD. It was more than enough money to support myself, but eventually just went to buy meth – my drug of choice. A lot of crime comes from that: people trying to sustain drug addiction.

When my first kid was born, I cut off everything. I'm careful.

PUBLIC RECORD: SALE OF CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES

Several years ago, a young man faced decades in prison for selling more than 200 hits of LSD over the course of a few months. Pleading guilty to a lesser charge, he was incarcerated for three years. Eight years later, he cannot find a landlord willing to rent to him; he is ineligible for public housing because of his record.

Although he's no longer in prison or on parole, he's still hamstrung: unable to find an employer willing to hire him or a safe and stable place to sleep. In the words of one advocate for record reform,

"You don't need a license to sell drugs on the street. If we leave people with no legal access to employment or government assistance – how do you think they'll feed themselves?"

IN THE NEWS:

PUBLIC BENEFITS AND DRUGS

The Sentencing Project found that banning people with drug convictions from receiving federal benefits has been ineffective in preventing either drug abuse or fraud and disproportionately burdens poor people of color.
